Achieving compliance in the reprocessing of ultrasound probes

Trish Seagrove

The appropriate management of ultrasound probes is a challenge which health care organisations face. There are a wide range of clinical settings and users of these devices and reprocessing frequently occurs outside of a sterilisation department. It essential that compliance with standards and advisories is achieved to deliver safe patient care. The journey to attain compliance is often challenging however gaining insight from others is beneficial. Resistance to change is something that will occur along the way however when we work together, we achieve more. It is essential that when you commence this journey that the destination is not forgotten as compliance is required.
